Bio

Ky Robinson is a queer multimedia contemporary artist currently working towards their Bachelor's in Fine Arts with a concentration in drawing, and a minor in art history. She mainly works with large scale abstract drawings of imagined organic forms, made up of small marks to imitate the patterns and textures we see on both microscopic and astronomical scales.

Artist Statement

As humans we look for patterns and familiarity in everything that we look at; whether you are conscious of it or not. My work challenges the viewer to go deeper into that instinct to search out familiar patterns by using small repetitive marks to create larger than life compositions, putting the viewer in a space that allows you to linger and connect your own experience of the piece to others. The process of creating these organisms is pretty intuitive, allowing the form to grow and develop in a natural way that takes up lots of physical space, then getting more strategic in the placements of marks as I'm filling it out. The portraits serve to remind the viewer of the invisible web that connects all life and matter in the universe, and that they are both a crucial and insignificant link to that web. I draw inspiration for my drawings from the world around me, and convey them through repetitive mark-making. The figures I draw are celebrations as well of the characters we see in and around everything all around us, and a call to take joy in the details.
