Bio

Chris Schlag is currently Senior Counsel for Tyson Foods, one of the world's largest food companies and a recognized leader in protein, focusing on Global Social Responsibility, Sustainability, and Stewardship. Before joining the company, Chris developed a diverse legal practice with experience working on a host of environmental, health, safety, and sustainability issues in a range of settings across industries through both in-house and private practice. She has, for example, worked with multi-national companies in the food, manufacturing, construction, and energy industries on management of COVID-19 and social issues in the workplace caused by the pandemic. She also previously served as Regulatory Counsel, Environmental Health & Safety for Whole Foods Market and worked on issues ranging from green chemistry, sustainable packaging, ingredient sourcing, and climate action, to human rights and animal welfare. She is passionate about environmental and sustainability law, human rights law, and animal welfare and a frequent speaker and author. She also regularly presents at conferences, on webinars, and provides training on ESG, Sustainability, and Environmental Law issues. Chris earned her J.D. from the University of Pittsburgh School of Law and graduated with honors. Before joining the legal profession, she also earned a M.S. in Occupational Safety & Health and Environmental Management from Columbia Southern University and B.S. in Environmental Health & Safety from Colorado State University. In her spare time, Chris does dot styled paintings using acrylics that highlight unique feelings and color theories.

Artist Statement

Color has a way of influencing perception, emotion, and feelings. My work aims to capture a feeling with color in a medium that takes shape through layers and after moments of reflection. In the end, it is never what I expected and able to give each viewer a different experience or response.
